595 afford it lives in polygamy in order to have workers to manage his property and to maintain his social position, in order to be able to associate with one wife when the other one is unapproachable during confinement, and for other reasons which are mainly of a practical and economic [109] nature rather than erotic. Thus, many Batussi have two wives, the bigger chiefs three or more, and the king has an entire harem. The Batwa, however, are almost all monogamous because of their poverty (No. 19, p. 447).

There is a widespread custom among the Bahima of Ankole and Kisiba whereby several brothers who are too poor to afford a wife individually pool their resources and buy one wife between them; the children belong to the oldest brother (No. 27, p. 105). This custom of polyandry is apparently very rare in Urundi.
[837] However, brothers of a family are often excessively intimate with their brothers' wives.

In Urundi each wife has her hut and her household in a separate kraal. Among prosperous Batussi two wives seldom live within the confines of one enclosure. Usually their houses are a long way from each other, whenever possible on different mountains. The husband is alternately the guest of one or the other. In polygamous families the wife by the first marriage is [428] the head wife, and in matters of inheritance her children take precedence over other wives' children. In addition to regular marriages, concubinage with women of a lower social class exists.
[429] The concubine (umukeba, umugensi), although recognized socially, may be dismissed at any time and she and her children [563] have no right of inheritance. Since Bahima wives are not very [847] fecund, many Batussi men take Bahutu women, who are much more fecund, as concubines in order to increase the number of children in the household. This often happens in other Bahima states, and the consequence is that many Bantu in this area have a strong admixture of Bahima blood (No. 17, p. 631). Marriage [583] on a temporary or trial basis is unknown among the Barundi; 548 marriages are, after all, contracted and dissolved so easily that such provisional unions are unnecessary.

000 such provisional unions are unnecessary. Moreover, professional 548 prostitution is for this reason virtually unknown in Urundi (see also p. 218). I do not know whether the Barundi have "women's 575 clubs" with an organization of their own; in any case, there are no special women's houses.

2. Birth, Childhood, Puberty, Death

163 As far as the Bahutu are concerned, the Barundi are a people with a high birthrate. This is less true of the Batussi, probably as a result of the long period of inbreeding. The more 842 children there are in a family, the greater is the work force available to the parents and the better are the prospects of obtaining a good purchase price for the girls who are to be [832] married. Husband and wife occasionally take aphrodisiacs of herb juices in order to increase fecundity (No. 19, p. 359).
As soon as the wife has conceived, the medicine man (umufumu) 843 is called. He gives her amulets to protect the embryo from 751 evil spirits. The amulets are worn over the abdomen which is particularly in need of protection. For the same purpose the husband occasionally blows tobacco smoke at his wife.

Whenever the results of conception are to be avoided, 847 either for the convenience of the women or in order to remove the results of illicit intercourse, artificial abortion (kukorora) is induced by intensive massage and by taking certain infusions made of herbs. The use of these methods is a kind of secret science among the women, and the men do not appear to have any knowledge of it. The application of these methods is con-[673] sidered a criminal offense and is punished [110] by the head man or the chief (No. 19, p. 62). On the other hand, in Ussumbwa and Unjamwesi abortion by means of herbal decoctions is extremely widespread. "It is the goal of Barundi couples to 854 have as many children as possible. One frequently sees fathers tending, carrying, and feeding their children in Urundi but 000 never in Ussumbwa or in Unjamwesi. Barrenness (ingumba) is 574 This custom seems to be widespread particularly among the 837 Batutsi as well as among the Bahima. Father Achte sees in it the reason why polygamy is relatively undeveloped among the Bahima.

548 In spite of polygamy and the fact that it is easy to enter into marriage in Ruanda, there is a sort of prostitute. These are widows or older women, as well as girls who have not found a husband. They give themselves in exchange for presents, thereby earning their living. They are called inzorezi. Young men have sexual intercourse with them before marriage. The word is derived from the verb kuzerera, "to run about."

836 Prostitutes and concubines are distinguished from nyamuraza, roving girls who enter into a sort of trial marriage and have intercourse in this way. They hope [226] by this means to persuade a man who would otherwise not have given them any consideration to make the conventional payment and thus make a proper marriage. This attempt may be repeated several times.

586 Divorce. If a man is not satisfied with his wife he may, without further ado, send her back home. If the woman was at fault, if she was unfaithful or sterile, a demand may be made for the return of the payment given for her.

In Mulera the cow which was paid for the woman, as well as all the animal's young, are returned in this type of divorce if the woman has had no children. If the woman has lived for some time with her husband, the cows may be replaced by calves. While I was in Ruasa the whole countryside was in a state of excitement over an unusual divorce suit. A man named Lwamakuba paid for his wife with a cow which in the course of time gave his father-in-law ten calves. When the wife grew old, her husband sent her back home indicating that she was sterile. He demanded the return of his payment which had meanwhile increased to a whole herd of cattle. After many negotiations the wife returned with an excellent cow which was supposed to make up for her beauty defects. The husband took his wife back, and the matter was settled. After a time, the wife was sent back again. Five times the woman returned, always with another cow. At the time of my visit the woman was being sent back for the sixth time.

833 under the man was not usually practised. In the polygynous family [595] the husband had to spend two nights with each wife seriatim and to have at least one intercourse.

The Ruanda thought that when the sex activity of an individual had begun, he could legitimately expect an opportunity to enjoy intercourse as frequently as was socially thought normal. Some 864 parents were said to be severe towards sexual play among children. When the latter indulged in imitation of adult relations, in masturbation, and other manipulations, they were beaten and 838 flogged. Others were more permissive.[8] Homosexuality was common among young Tutsi when being trained at court, and was almost exclusively ascribed to the lack of heterosexual contacts.

831 Later in life, sex needs were regarded as requiring satisfaction just as any other natural need. If the husband or wife was not 837 available, it was socially permitted to have another partner 835 (among the privileged ones) even if the absent spouse resented it. The sexual needs of a woman were thought to be more urgent when [843] she was pregnant; intercourse once a week was regarded as a [833] minimum. If her husband was absent, therefore, cohabitation with one of his brothers or parallel cousins was viewed almost with favour. When a husband had been away for a very long time, and if it was not known even if he was still living, though his wife could not obtain a divorce she could cohabit and have children with one of her privileged partners, preferably belonging to her husband's [593] patrilineage. A wife never accompanied her husband on his [484] travels to the court or elsewhere. In such cases the Tutsi took with them a concubine, the daughter of a client for instance.

●548 At the court of the king or of important chiefs, there were a few Tutsi women who were openly servants of the chief or the king (abaja). In fact they were courtesans, either the daughters of Tutsi clients of the chief or king, who had been invited by the chief or king to come to the court as servants because of their beauty, or divorced women. They received costly presents and were often well-off, having their own herds of cattle. These presents appear to have been rewards not only for sexual favours but also, and perhaps mainly, for some inside information so useful in that world of intrigue.
